
In Part III, Ethics of Economic Life, the "Ethics of Property," "Harmony and Discord in Economic Life," and "The Ethics of Bargaining" are covered.

We recommend this study highly.

It may be recalled that Charles Chapin, one time city editor, shot his wife and then claiming he intended to shoot himself, did not do so. A legally appointed commission found him suffering from cerebral syphilis, but sane, and he lived out some fifteen years in Sing Sing, where his gardening activities brought him considerable publicity.

Through this, Constance came into the picture and these letters. It is difficult to appraise them. As bits of literature they do not shine. One gets from them glimpses of the Sing Sing life, but they are not even good reporting.

As illustrative of the man’s inner feelings they are very thin, even banal and arid.

When it is remembered that the examinations of the laboratory presented to the "Commission" showed cerebrospinal Wassermann and increased cells, it is probable that treatment in Sing Sing arrested further progress of the cerebral vascular disease but left the intellectual powers impaired to the extent that these letters are just ordinary and not what might have been expected as the product of a brain which, when it was healthy, had shown the capacity that was shown as city editor of the "World."

Nattrass, Frederick. The Commoner Nervous Diseases. [Oxford University Press, Milford, London. 12s. 6d.]

Dr. Nattrass is assistant physician, Royal Victoria Infirmary, Newcastle upon Tyne. He has written a very readable book upon certain indiscriminately chosen nervous disorders. After thirty-two pages of methods of examination, he has shorter or longer articles on Disseminated Sclerosis, Neurosyphilis, Subacute Combined Cord Degenerations, Myelitis and Poliomyelitis, Compression of the Cord, Neuritis, Muscular Atrophy, Epilepsy, Brain Abscess and Tumor,